Built by the Warner Brothers in 1931 at a cost of $750,000, the Warner Theatre was a premier movie house which thrived for decades. The theatre was designed by the famous and prolific architect Thomas Lamb and contains stunning art deco designs and elaborate murals of Litchfield County. By the late 1960s, the Warner could no longer compete with the suburban cinema multiplexes and the Warner Brothers sold the property to private managers. As business continued to decline, the building fell into disrepair. In 1982, the theatre's owners faced foreclosure and the Warner was slated for demolition. A group of concerned citizens led a grass roots campaign to form the Northwest Connecticut Association for the Arts, Inc. to save the landmark structure. In 1983, the Warner reopened as a performing arts center. At last count, it was one of only forty-six of Lamb's magnificent works still in operation. Today, the Warner is the largest performing arts center in Litchfield County and a major destination showcasing internationally acclaimed artists, classical music and dance, community theatre and civic events. In addition, the Warner Theatre Center for Arts Education provides onsite performing arts classroom instruction and performances for thousands of children around the region.
